Cocaine Case

The BBC Newsroom Southeast study has shown these detections of cocaine on 99% of the bills in currency. I believe that through much of the dealings that usually money is passed and there is no credit cards ever used in dealing. This leads to the whole market being dealt in bills. All money gets carried around from place to place and the bills do rub up against each other causing the substances to be passed from bills to bills, and from hands to bills. Also if the oil is being carried around on people's hands then handshakes can also pass the substance along with the counting machines. This evidence that all the people are doing cocaine is false and even though there are a higher number of users, the percentage of people could never get this high.

There is not a serious problem of cocaine use; there is a problem with the prices going down. The problem is that the price has been cut in half and that there are more people trying it. There could be a dramatic increase in people doing the drug, but there is not a serious problem according to the evidence because the numbers are false and show nothing of a correlation between the people who do it and pass the bills. There is far less of a problem with ecstasy, because there was only one percent of the bills that high traces and only four percent that had any. The biggest error in all of these bills is that the machines could be passing the evidence without any human contact at all.

All the results are skewed and they are misleading because the traces of cocaine and ecstasy are passed through touch and through machines. The country should find another way to determine the problem of cocaine and ecstasy use. They really should be looking at how the price has dropped, because this means that much more is being brought into the country. They should be tracking down the sources and where the high level of cocaine and ecstasy is being found. They should look at different areas and which areas have the higher levels of cocaine on the bills, because this could lead to where the drug dealers and users are living.
